Every day at lunch he took a basket of food down to his father and two brothers. It was quite an adventure to him to sink into the dark hole of the mine standing in the bucket, and he always enjoyed the trip. It was one of his few pleasures in life, for the crippled boy knew he could never do the heavy work of mining coal, and there was no way open by which he could learn his heart's desire—managing an engine.

One day just as he stepped into the bucket at noon with the lunch the superintendent joined the party. He did not notice the quiet boy with the pail,

And rumbling a furnace. if from a furnace. And through the black galleries thundered a crashing as of thousands of tons falling. Just then the superintendent rushed up, his face white with fear.

"The mine is afire," he whispered.
"We must run for fresh air." Too late, the men turned to fiee. Already up the long lane of coal was rush-ling a dense column of smoke with the flames darting about in its blackness. And above the roar come the crash of falling timbers and the groans of the imprisoned men. There seemed no es-cape, but to remain was certain death. Sam caught sight of a timber about to tumble and stood up to keep it back. But his frail strength was nothing, and the log broke his slender leg.

redolent with the mysticism and symbolism of the East, has figured in this season's theatrical presentations in Washington.

Early in the fall came a foretaste of what was in store in Miss Nina Norris' "The Yellow Peril," the one-ac secret service play presented at Chase's. Then came "The Yellow Jacket"-one of the supreme novelties of this or any other recent season—and last week there was "The Daughter of Heaven," a massively mounted and superbly presented drama of the China of other

It is their machinations and schemings which hold "I believe I can find a passage out, screamed Sam above the noise. "My dog showed me a passage through the left gallery, down a slope and through some rock to the hill outside. I will try to find it and come back to you." But in the awful confusion no one heard or noticed the boy. Dragging his hurt leg after him he crawled rapidly along the lot.

Of the work of Walker White the Japanese spy one cannot have too much praise. Self-contained, repressive when the lines fairly cried for melodramatic utterance which would have detracted from their effectiveness, and wearing a well-nigh perfect make-up, Mr. Whiteside did not appear to act Tokeramo-he was Tokeramo. His more dramatic moments were marked with an excellent repression, while his softer peeches were characterised by a finish which rendered it a positive delight to be able to listen to them. Tokeramo lery which already contains such excellent bits of characterization as those of Mr. Whiteside in "The Meiting Pot" and "The Magic Melody"-two of the finest character sketches of the modern American stage.

American stage.

It is a pity that one cannot conscientiously say the same of the work of Miss Florence Fisher, as Iliona, the other "big" role of "The Typhoon."
Her demi-mondaine was too coarse, too unfinished, too much of the Broadway type to have appealed to a man of the innate refinement of Tokeramo. The harsh notes which she injected into her voice in the second act seemed utterly out of accord with the soft, carressing tones of the first, while her posturing "The Typhoon" gives splendid opper-tunity for a large number of smaller roles, all of them excellently done.

Among the best were the Joshikawa of Stephen Wright, the Omayi of Arda la Croix, and the Lindner of Hubert Wilke. The latter marred his first act appear ance by overacting, but his other scenes were admirably finished.

Whether "The Typhoon" is a true presentation of the imminence of the yellow peril, not only to Germany but to the entire world, is a matter for discontinuous cussion and argument—but the ap-pears to be none about the power of the play. It is a melodrama of con-vincing power and compelling interest, combining the mysticism of the East
